

David Tod

David currently lectures in the School of Sport and Exercise Sciences at Liverpool John Moores University, Liverpool, United Kingdom. He has worked as an academic and applied practitioner in New Zealand, Australia, and the UK. One of his primary research areas is the training, supervision, and development of applied sport psychology practitioners, and is driven by two key questions. First, what are the characteristics of effective practitioners? Second, how can we help individuals improve their ability to serve clients? David has been invited to present his research in the UK, Europe, Middle East, and North America. Both questions underpinning his research stem from David's experiences as an applied practitioner. He has worked for professional rugby, rugby league, and cricket teams, along with athletes from various sports ranging from amateurs to professionals and Olympians. His applied experience has focused on performance enhancement, career transition, and well-being. David received his PhD in 2007 from Victoria University, Australia, and he has about 100 peer reviewed publications and five books. Currently, he is the Associate Editor for the Professional Practice Section of The Sport Psychologist and is an Associate Editor for the International Review of Sport and Exercise Psychology.
